

STEGNER CENTER TWELFTH ANNUAL SYMPOSIUM

The Wallace Stegner Center's 12th annual symposium will explore issues of Colorado River management, focusing on the seven-state Colorado River Compact and other aspects of the "Law of the River," the complex set of laws, treaties, cases, regulations, and other documents that govern use and management of the Colorado River. The fundamental question to be explored in this two-day symposium is whether the 1922 Compact is resilient enough to meet the environmental needs and to withstand the hydrological, climatic, economic, and other real-world changes of the next century, or whether significant changes to the compact or other laws are necessary.

The Stegner Center will be joined by policy analysts, water users, scientists, economists, political leaders, environmental advocates, and others to consider whether the Colorado River

Compact needs to be refashioned. Critical issues include how Colorado River water might be re-allocated among the Upper and Lower Basin states, Native American tribes, Mexico, and instream environmental uses, and what effect this might have on the ecological health of the river as well as surrounding communities and other users of Colorado River resources.

The goal for this year's symposium is to promote understanding of the cultural and historical forces that shaped the Colorado River Compact and how the realities of the New West, including the urbanization of the region, population growth, environmental damage, and increased water demands, along with a changing environmental ethic, might suggest a need to reconsider something as fundamental as the 1922 Colorado River Compact.
